Asylum Seekers Found To Be Human

Recent research leaked by breakaway government think tank GBH has suggested that, contrary to popular belief, asylum seekers are, in fact, human.

As part of a controlled experiment known as "The Immigration Act 2002" asylum seeker's human rights were stripped away and their responses closely monitored.

In tests which have resulted in maiming and multiple deaths, people seeking protection were locked up without trial, housed in the most racist areas of run down inner cities across Britain, denied the right to work and the right to claim benefits. Many were kept in total isolation. Others were sent back to certain death to their countries of origin with a handful being hung in airports.

Throughout the tests people were monitored for their responses through a series of psychological examinations involving unobtrusive cameras and internal wiring. GBH assured MEN that no physical harm caused by research techniques came to the people seeking protection during the study and that people were sometimes given food and phone cards in return for their co-operation.

Billy from GBH told MEN journalist that the results of these tests were startling:

"When they were treated like humans they came across as survivors, smart people who had successfully escaped difficult and dangerous situations. After a few months under the new regime we saw a marked change. We found that asylum seekers responded to pain and humiliation much the same as you or I. Of the 200 who took part in the experiment 160 are now clinically depressed and of these 10 have attempted to commit suicide. The fear of the immigration lottery and the prospect of an untimely death at the hands of their persecutors had resulted in extreme stress-related diseases in previously fit young people. Time and time again, asylum seekers could be seen to clearly manifest an awareness of past and future, which proves conclusively that they are in fact human."

This comes as potentially disturbing news to the government who had been operating on the basis that human rights did not apply to asylum seekers. Home Office members had been following the research with interest and had enshrined many of the experiments in law, in the hope of dissuading people from seeking protection in Britain.

Since the publication of these unexpected results the Home Office has released the following statement:

"This is a stunning case of bad science. These results are unsubstantiated and the report has clearly been sexed up by a misty-eyed liberal."

A spokesperson from the Home Office was able to confirm to MEN that they would be pressing ahead with the new amendments to the bill which involve support being withheld from families who were denied the right to work and children of people seeking protection being forcibly taken away from their parents.

The chief scientist involved in the experiment was yesterday found dead under mysterious circumstances.

Cattle: actually quite different from asylum seekers

Reflections By An Immigration Official

Bob Tunwhitham speaks about his job: "Well it's easy to judge with the wisdom of hindsight - how were we supposed to know that these foreign folk had feelings just like us."

"Now I come to think of it there were loads of clues. Like when they wept when families were separated, attempted suicide when we tried to remove them - all of which would suggest a degree of feeling and free will. Still, even then I thought they were just putting it on. Like parrots."

TRAVEL SPECIAL: There's No Place like Baghdad!

Correspondent Claire Swede finds that away from the bustle and hype Iraq offers a holiday destination like no other

To be honest I didn't know what to expect when my editor suggested writing an article on holidaying in Iraq. Images of evil dictators and weapons of mass destruction means Iraq isn't everybody's idea of a relaxing mini-break! But never one to pass up a chance of a free trip abroad, on arrival

Luxury in downtown Bagdad

I was pleasantly surprised to find that there is so much more to Iraq than the headlines suggest.

Our accommodation was a palace, literally. The Combined Joint Task Force-7 has taken over Saddam's central Baghdad Palace and converted it into Victory Base (<http://victoryteam.250free.com>). With the cheery slogan "Victory, it will be done" we were treated to all the comforts of home far from home. With a Burger King just up the road and dinner "a smorgasbord from which no one went away hungry." Well the US Army that is - I hear its not quite so cheery for the locals.

There were plenty of organised tours around Baghdad to keep us busy. Many a lazy afternoon drifted away playing "guess-what-that-building-was-before-it-was-bombed". Dodging left over cluster bombs, depleted uranium contamination and the wrath of locals ensured there was never a dull moment.

Opportunities to mix with the locals were, thankfully, somewhat limited although some could often be seen being led through the base in hoods. Their haunting cries were often heard ringing out as the sunset over the Baghdad skyline. Best of all were the children. Beautiful and lively it was only a shame they are going to grow up to be Iraqis. I'll never forget little Ali, adopted as the camp mascot after his family were accidentally killed in a bombing raid. His trusting eyes as he crawled along (having lost both legs in aforementioned raid).

All in all I was very sad to be on the plane home. Iraq - a beautiful, historic country. May it never change.

Come prepared: insect repellent, malaria pills and an M16 are essential

Commiss, students, the unemployed, bleeding heart liberals, do-gooders etc...

To protect our freedom to protest we must first restrict our freedom to protest proclaims police chief

After embarrassing slip ups in the past, Greater Manchester Police today announced their master plan for facilitating legitimate protest at this weekend's Labour Party Spring Conference. "Peaceful protesters have a right to demonstrate in whatever manner they feel necessary", remarked Police Chief Andy Trotter, "as long they do so within the designated PPA (Peaceful Protest Area - a 2m<sup>2</sup> area of pavement on the edge of Albert Square)."

"I stand firm in defence of people's right to protest," relates Trotter, "as long as they provide GM Police with their full personal details, a sample of DNA, fingerprints, school report cards and a full run down of their political view in advance." Any protesters deemed not to be terrorists or terrorist sympathisers will have total freedom of the PPA. "It's a system that worked well in the Soviet Union," pipes Trotter.

The tactic, known a 'herd and pen' was inspired by Trotter's weekend visits to sheep farms in the Peaks: "Too often in the past protesters have been a visible presence" relates Trotter, "often they have waived placards and at times even got their message across. The PPA allows demonstrators to have their voice heard but the 2m area means this happens a safe distance from delegates and members of the public in general."

"After all," he continues, "for delegates to actually hear what the public think could be a threat to national security and ultimately democracy itself."

EXTREMIST ORGANISATION SAYS "GIVE PEACE A CHANCE"

"Maybe killing not the answer," claim dangerous nutters

LONDON, Thursday – A group of representatives from the extremist organisation "Alliance for Peace" yesterday unveiled their twisted and misguided world view at a London press conference. Speaking under a banner which read "Give Peace a Chance", the group's representatives claimed to have the answer to both the asylum problem and the West's ongoing "War on Terror":

Replacing the world's current economic system which favours wealthy western countries over poor ones with one that is fair, equitable and ultimately democratic.

The torrent of filth continued as a group spokesperson suggested that if the $800 m spent annually on arms around the globe was targeted elsewhere the world could eliminate hunger, preventable disease and poverty. Commenting on the group's statements, Home

Look: they even look like freaks

Secretary David Blunkett said, "This is the sort of vile, malicious preaching we have to stamp out in this country. I am doing everything I can to prevent people like this from spreading their propaganda, take the new Civil Contingencies Bill, for instance. Freedom of speech can only go so far. If I had my way, and I probably soon will, it would not go very far at all."

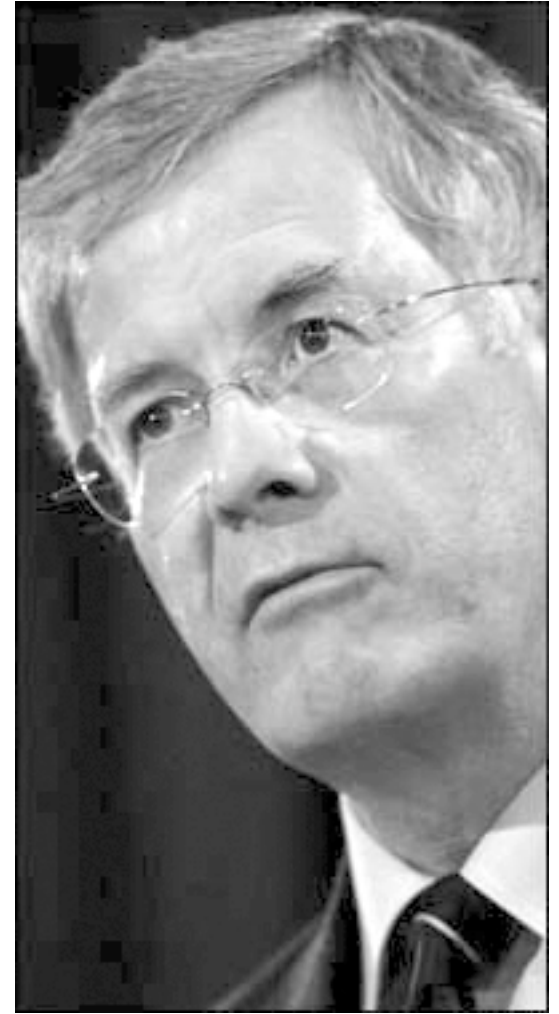

Blunkett: not as mad as he looks (though still quite mad)

New Vice Chancellor receives warm welcome at University of Manchester

“I’ll soon sort this chaos of learning and independent research out”, says incoming VC

MANCHESTER – The University of Manchester last month welcomed Professor Alan Gilbert to the city, the man set to replace Sir Martin Harris as Vice Chancellor in October. Professor Gilbert is expected to introduce radical reforms concerning the management of funding at the university, an issue for which he became famous in his home country of Australia. While in his former post as Vice Chancellor at the University of Melbourne, Professor Gilbert succeeded in turning the traditionally independent and somewhat democratically-run university into a thriving commercial venture.

Students delighted at the announcement

Among his ground-breaking reforms was the formation of a managerial executive in which the VC reserved the right of veto for any of the board’s decisions, thus solving the problem of having to get some sort of democratic legitimacy for decisions made which would affect staff and students. Thus ideally poised to introduce sweeping changes, Professor Gilbert launched his agenda of substantially increasing fees, investing university money in commerce and bringing in millions of dollars worth of corporate sponsorship.

The results of these reforms have been remarkable: An increased number of students from more affluent families and a corresponding decrease in the number of students from disadvantaged backgrounds, serving to right the wrongs of equal opportunity and ‘inter-class-mingling’; An end to tiresome, old-fashioned ‘independence’ of education and research, placing these firmly in the benevolent and capable hands of corporations and big business; A gradual ‘starving-out’ of unwanted, irritating and superfluous subjects such as sociology, anthropology, history and literature studies, leading to the transformation of the university into what it was always meant to be: a vocational training academy for corporations.

The reforms in Melbourne met with inexplicable resistance from Australian university staff, students and other leftie cretins. A book has recently been published revealing the “damage” Prof. Gilbert’s reforms had on Melbourne University. However, we have no reason to disbelieve Prof. Gilbert when he says that most people were pleased with the reforms. When then asked why it was necessary for him to drive around in a bullet-proof car the last few years in Australia, he replied: “I wanted to be prepared in case aliens attack from outer space.” Fair enough.

ROBERT KILROY-SILK

The Irish – a race of toothless simpletons

During my long, successful career as the even-handed, fair-minded presenter of BBC’s Kilroy programme, I met a wide selection of members of modern British society – everyone from OAPs on day trips to young females in fragile states of mind (who I had to comfort by placing a friendly arm around them). In that time I got a pretty good look at Britain today. I’ve managed to form a reasonable view of this ‘United Kingdom’ and I must say this: All Irish people are thick and stupid. They eat potatoes and while away the long hours in basement bars drinking Guinness. They are ignorant of current affairs, do anything the Pope says and their delinquent children ride horses through city streets. They torture mules in Tipperary by mercilessly stabbing feathers into their behinds. They all believe in leprechauns, which have been scientifically proven not to exist.

Now, I’ve personally never met any Irish people nor have I ever been to Ireland but my time on my long-running, highly successful daytime chat show makes me ideally placed to form opinions such as these and it is my right to exercise my freedom of speech. After all, I am affair-minded, common-sense, man of the people.

Kilroy’s new show, I, Kilroy, is currently broadcast on weekdays, 6am-7am on digital channel 3544 in the Anglia region only.

NEXT WEEK: The Scots: tight-fisted, money grabbing, ginger etc...

Leprechauns: Irish belief persists despite scientific proof of non-existence
